FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

BILLINGS – David Ison, Rocky Mountain College associate professor of aviation, has been selected to be the editor of the aviation scholarly journal, the Collegiate Aviation Review. Published by the University Aviation Association, it is a prestigious, peer-reviewed, publication in the aviation industry.

Ison will immediately begin serving as the associate editor and will assume the primary editor position in the fall of 2011.

“This provides Rocky with tremendous national exposure and raises the perception of the rigor and excellence of the aviation program among industry peers,” said Michael Mace, RMC president. “We’re delighted that David has been chosen to be the editor.”

Papers published in the Collegiate Aviation Review are selected from submissions that were subjected to a blind peer review process, for presentation at the annual University Aviation Association Education Conference.

The University Aviation Association is the only professional organization representing all levels of the non-engineering/technology element in collegiate aviation education. Working through its officers, trustees, committees and professional staff, the University Aviation Association plays a vital role in collegiate aviation and in the aviation industry.
